

The Verge

Reason is a fine thing, but remember there are other ways to live: by instinct or passion, or even, maybe, by revelation. Try it. Come around again to the verge – that place of about to open, near where we comprehend and laugh and see. You in your very real life might be about to take your own foot and step into clear waters that are entirely new. Why shouldn't something marvelous happen to you? Take even an occasion like this:

A man reading at night looked up at the window to find a moose looking in, interested and unafraid with quiet dark eyes. He reports he has never been the same: he finds the ungainly and miraculous everywhere.

He said it started the next night in the empty window as he watched his reflection looking right back through.

He said he saw his own beauty, how even in his same old face the quiet eyes were curious and ready to be true.

-- Annie Lighthart